ANNUAL REPORT
2023-2024

FROM THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

HONORING COURAGE, CULTIVATING HOPE, DELIVERING SUCCESS.

At Parrott Creek, we recognize that seeking help often takes unparalleled courage. For many of our clients, stepping into our care signifies confronting daunting realities: escaping abusive relationships, facing addiction, or rebuilding family connections. These moments of bravery are the foundation of the transformative journeys we witness every day.

Our role is to honor this courage, nurture it into hope, and guide it toward success. As we share this year's impact, the data speaks volumes—but the voices and stories behind these numbers truly illuminate the life-changing work made possible by your kindness.

While this Annual Report covers our 2023–2024 fiscal year, we are already thinking about the year ahead. We have set a bold vision for what we believe the programs and services we offer should look like. We state loudly and often that the status quo simply isn't good enough, and it is our job to go far above, and way beyond, what is expected of us. To us, that is what it means to be a values-based organization that puts the needs of its clients first and foremost.

With you—our community of family, friends, and supporters—we are building brighter futures. With your continued partnership, we will expand our reach and amplify our impact.

SPOTLIGHT STORY

CULTURAL ECOLOGY PROGRAM.

Healing Through Heritage and Nature

In collaboration with Native American communities and other communities of color in the Portland Metro area, we're proud to highlight our Cultural Ecology Program, a unique landback initiative. This program merges environmental education with Indigenous practices, fostering a connection to nature as a means of trauma recovery and addressing the fact that access to culturally appropriate natural areas is a vital component of community wellness.

Our 80-acre site—ancestral lands of the Chinook, Kalapuya, and Molalla people—is at the heart of this program. Led by our cultural ecologists and guided by local cultural experts and community partners, the project integrates traditional ecological knowledge and culturally responsive practices to support children and families impacted by systemic inequities. Youth and families engage in activities like habitat restoration, field science, and cultural workshops both on our property as well as throughout the Willamette Valley and beyond. Together, folks reclaim their connections to the land while addressing the generational impacts of trauma.

One year ago, in February of 2024, the Cultural Ecology program hosted its first community volunteer restoration day in partnership with Bark, an organization focused on "defending and restoring Mt. Hood National Forest and surrounding public lands." The event drew more than 20 people from across the metro area. Through the rain and mud, the group removed encroaching blackberries from a restoration area in our wetlands that had been previously cleared and planted by youth in our residential treatment program. In attendance that day was an employee of Chemawa Indian School and Friends of Trees, who was inspired by the Cultural Ecology program and interested in planning an event for Chemawa students in his Environmental Science class. In April, this employee returned with nine of his students to visit our site and practice cultural use plant surveys. While practicing field science skills, these Native American students from all over the United States also learned more about local first foods and traditional plant knowledge.

Further inspired, Chemawa Indian School then asked Parrott Creek to host the entirety of their school - over 200 students and staff - most of whom found themselves far from their homelands and with limited access to the outdoors. Although our site was under construction for our new youth residential treatment buildings, the Cultural Ecology team was determined to meet this request. Reaching out to the first-ever partners of our program - Friends of Tryon Creek - the team planned to host the school at Tryon Creek State Natural Area, collaborating with other community partners including MAD Bears, LLC, and Friends of Trees. In May of 2024, after just one month of planning, they were successful in hosting a half-day of service learning for Chemawa with rotating stations that included activities such as identifying culturally important plant species; exploring aquatic ecosystems; learning about local wildlife through trail cameras and specimens; habitat restoration; and tasting a variety of traditional first foods. The event was a wonderful success, and ended with students and staff, including the principal, requesting the same be planned for the following year.

This series of events was a perfect snapshot of the Cultural Ecology program. A simple event getting the community out on the land and actively participating in its stewardship impacted an individual, which led to impacting nine more, which led to impacting 200 others in just a few months time. Combining science and culture, this program keeps community at its core to bring humans closer to nature - all thanks to a strong network of carefully built relationships.

Your support fuels innovative projects like this, ensuring we continue to honor heritage, foster resilience, and create pathways to brighter futures.

CAMPAIGN UPDATE

Building on our 56-year heritage providing residential care to some of Oregon's most vulnerable children and youth, Parrott Creek is working with local and national experts (including the University of Oregon and Harvard University) to re-envision the care, treatment and physical spaces provided to youth in residential settings. We are developing sector-leading, transformative, and culturally responsive approaches to residential treatment and we are placing ourselves at the heart of statewide efforts to meet the ever-changing needs of vulnerable children and families. In particular, we are responding to the growth in demand for mental health and drug-treatment services and programs that can reverse the disproportionate impact of behavioral health challenges.
